

Statistical methods for finding and classifying new genes - Jonathan Keith

Complex genomes such as the human genome contain large quantities of sequence of as yet unknown function. Identifying parts of the genome that have function, and understanding what that function is, are difficult tasks, in which statistical methods can play a role. In this project the student will be developing and applying Bayesian methods for this purpose.